History of Interior Design

The interior design profession has undergone significant transformation over the past century. What began as a focus on decoration has evolved into a specialized field requiring years of education and expertise. The term "Interior Decorator" first emerged in the early 1900s, with Dorothy Draper becoming the first commercial interior decorator. In the 1930s, the term "Interior Designer" was introduced, marking the profession's shift toward a more technical and professional identity. Throughout the 20th century, organizations like the American Institute of Interior Designers (AID) were established to formalize the field, and in the 1970s, institutions such as FIDER and NCIDQ were created to set standards for education and certification. By the 1980s, U.S. legislation began to support the profession's growing importance. Today, interior design encompasses specialized areas like healthcare, aging-in-place, and workplace design, highlighting its vital role in public health, safety, and well-being.

A dramatic interior space, possibly a museum or gallery, featuring a large, ornate chandelier with many small, glowing elements. A woman in a white dress is visible on the left, reaching out towards a display. The room has dark wood paneling and a large, textured orange rug. The overall atmosphere is sophisticated and artistic.
